

. A typical nightmare about moving in to a new home. One morning the house seemed deserted and it was difficult to locate the owners. Neighbours from hell, people slamming doors, noise complaints, questions about where you parked your car (a common scenario) and all this is because you moved into an apartment complex that had no parking lot for residents. The experience can be scary if you don't know what you're doing, but here are some steps that might help make these neighbours into your best friends! First of all - do not be afraid to talk with them directly. If there is a problem, solve it. For example, some people always park near your car and don't understand why you can't park next to them. Ask them nicely to park their car elsewhere or determine who needs to park elsewhere, if the situation is similar. It's better than trying to handle an unreasonable person with anger and ill thoughts. If you are having problems with the neighbors of the opposite sex, it's probably best not to say anything directly. This can be very hard but it keeps your options open. Do not pretend that you don't see them, do not ignore that they talk to you, do not answer the door when they knock. This is a good way to have a relationship with all the neighbours, even those you hate. When you go to work or your friends want to visit, ask them if they want to use your place as well. This might be a nice gesture and it causes them to appreciate you as a person for being considerate towards them. When moving in, leave areas of small objects, such as tools and lamps on the floor so that your neighbours can see these things and understand where everything is located. Sometimes people remove these things later on and this will prevent misunderstandings and arguments later on. If neighbours of your neighbours arrive and you don't know them, plan to greet and offer them a drink. This way they'll get more acquainted with the neighbours and you'll find out if they have anything to say about you or your neighbours. If your relations are not bad at all, just leave them alone and do not interfere with their lives. If you think that a neighbour of yours is acting suspiciously, try taking care of it yourself instead of reporting this immediately to the police or security guards. If something happens, then you will be responsible for this action in the future. However, in situations where there is suspicion over criminal activity, always contact the authorities in order to prevent any potential damage.
